SUNNY LOGGIA HOUSE

A new detached house built in a residential area of Tokyo originally developed in the 1950s. While neighboring sites have been subdivided, this project site kept the original property size. This made possible the client's request to have an extensive garden. The site was developed in two parts, the South part is a garden of trees, flowers and vegetables, and the North part is the house. They are tied with a roofed semi-open space called a loggia. The garden side of the loggia has a large window without glass. The interior of the house is connected to the loggia with various windows. The habitant's behavior is influenced by the fresh green environment, the sun and shadows, birds and animals, and the gathering of neighbors. In other words, the loggia ties life through the property beyond the site's borders using nature and the neighboring environment.
